The relationship of kinship to gender has occupied a rich and contentious position in anthropology. The tension between these two concepts can be found at the root of much debate in anthropological works on Aboriginal people from Australia. In this paper, I will address how Aboriginalist contributions, collectively, raise fundamental questions central to an understanding of the roles contemporary men and women play in the larger universe of Yuendumu, a Warlpiri settlement located in Central Australia.